3:26: Provost Philbert
Provost Philbert presented an overview of the budget process, identifying Amy Dittmar, Vice Provost for Academic and Budgetary Affairs as the leader of the budget team. His office provides funding for academic units, research units, public good units and central units such as the office of General Counsel and Student Affairs. His Office does not allocate money to the medical system or auxiliary units (e.g., intercollegiate athletics).

The first phase of the budgeting process consists of in-depth conversations with the deans and directors about programs that will add to the unit’s excellence. He also identified “environmental threats” to the University as including public questioning of the value of a liberal arts education; the value of pure research; the charge that the University environment silences conservative voices; the claim that a university degree is unnecessary for getting a good job; and that spending is wasteful and extravagant, with excessive expenditure on non-educational items such as dormitories, recreational facilities, and mental health services. Provost Philbert recognizes that incomes have been stagnant and that people do not feel they are better off than their parents at the same age, a sentiment that is translated into “college does not work.”

Provost Philbert feels that the conclusion that “college does not work” is false as a college degree improves average earning trajectory, while enhancing quality of life, individual and community involvement, opportunity, mobility, citizenship, civic engagement, health and longevity. University research advances knowledge and enhances culture, while the institutions serve as conservatories of history and culture. Money spent on facilities responds to student interest in participating in extra-curricular activities, and the common interest of faculty and students in pursuing healthy lifestyles in high quality exercise environments.

Provost Philbert said university budgets began to change at the end of the Second World War when the federal government enhanced funding for both research and student support. These remain important sources of revenue and are supplemented by private money derived from tuition, fees, gifts and endowment distribution. While there has been in an equilibrium of growth for the last few years, the University now faces some specific challenges, including a decline in state support from 64% to 15% of the General Fund, with the result that the University has to provide the bulk of support for students.

Provost Philbert said that his goals in developing the budget are to increase academic excellence with strategic investments that build on the strength of outstanding academic programs and solidify the University’s position as the nation’s top public university. He singled out the Bioscience Initiative, the potential of augmented-, virtual, and mixed-reality technologies (much of which has uses in the entertainment industry); the search for poverty solutions; and pedagogies based on “learning by doing.” In terms of the University’s role as a conservator of culture he drew attention to the Power Family Program for Inuit at the University of Michigan Museum of Art (https://www.umma.umich.edu/exhibitions/2019/the-power-family-program-for-inuit-art-tililirmangittuq). He noted that employers of recent graduates report satisfaction with their skills.

In terms of the University’s effort to enhance access and affordability, Provost Philbert drew attention to the Wolverine Pathways Program (https://wolverinepathways.umich.edu) which had supported a graduating class of 88 students in 2018 (45 of whom enrolled at the University of Michigan-Ann Arbor and 15 of whom enrolled at the University of Michigan-Dearborn), and the transition of the Hail Scholarships (https://record.umich.edu/articles/hail-promise-effectively-recruits-low-income-students-u-m) to the Go Blue Guarantee (https://finaid.umich.edu/go-blue-guarantee-eligibility/), which currently supports nearly 1700 students. He pointed out that undergraduate aid had increased more rapidly than tuition over the past decade as a result of fiscal restraint, reallocation of resources and philanthropy. He noted that the University’s freshman retention rate is 97%; its six-year graduation rate is 92%, and it receives $1.4 billion in federal grants.

Provost Philbert identified the major challenges as being political limitations to the high tuition/high aid model of funding, on altering the mix of in-state and out-of-state students despite the foreseeable decline of the number of students graduating from Michigan high schools below 100,000; uncertain growth in the state’s higher education budget; and the increasing difficulty in identifying administrative efficiencies.

Librarian Spencer asked if the Provost was worried by President Trump’s threat to cut federal funding to Universities that failed to allow conservative voices to be heard on campuses. Provost Philbert said that this was not a concern given that Ben Shapiro and other very conservative speakers had been to campus. A Senate Assembly member asked Provost Philbert if he would rather have more out-of-state undergraduates. Provost Philbert replied that the University needs a balance of in-state and out-of-state students congruent with its mission as a public institution.

4:00 SACUA Nominee remarks
